The Congo War, which began in 1998, has been one of the most brutal and devastating conflicts in recent history. Millions of people have been killed, and millions more have been displaced from their homes. Women and children have been particularly hard hit by the violence. They have been subjected to rape, torture, and other forms of sexual violence. They have also been forced to witness the murder of their loved ones and the destruction of their communities.

Denis Mukwege is a Congolese gynecologist who has dedicated his life to helping women who have been victims of sexual violence. He founded the Panzi Hospital in Bukavu, which provides free medical care to women who have been raped. Mukwege has also been a vocal advocate for an end to the violence against women in Congo. He has spoken out against the use of rape as a weapon of war and has called for international action to stop the violence.

Love Song for Congo is a powerful indictment of the international community's failure to act in the face of one of the worst humanitarian crises of our time.
