Nan is a poor orphan girl who lives in a rundown boarding house. She is constantly mistreated by her landlady and the other occupants of the house. Bess, on the other hand, is a wealthy young woman who lives in a luxurious mansion with her parents. She is unhappy with her life and longs for more freedom.

One day, Nan and Bess meet by chance at a park. They start talking and quickly realize that they have a lot in common. They both feel trapped in their lives and they both dream of a better future.

After a while, Nan and Bess come up with a plan. They will switch identities. Nan will pretend to be Bess and Bess will pretend to be Nan.

This will allow them to escape their current lives and start new ones.

The plan works perfectly at first. Nan quickly adapts to her new life of luxury and Bess enjoys the freedom of living in poverty. However, it soon becomes clear that the switch has not solved either of their problems.

Nan finds that she is not happy being someone she is not. She misses her old life and the people she left behind. Bess, on the other hand, finds that she is not strong enough to live on her own. She misses the support of her family and friends.

Eventually, Nan and Bess realize that they have made a mistake. They decide to switch back to their original identities. However, this is not as easy as it seems. The people in their lives are not willing to accept them back.
